

China 'a key piece' in helping Africa drive industrialization

China-Africa relations have significantly evolved since the inaugural Forum on China-Africa Cooperation in 2000. In a recent interview, Hannah Ryder, CEO of Development Reimagined, shared her insights on this growing partnership and its future implications. She highlighted how Chinese economic policies have been highly beneficial for many African countries, noting that China will be "a key piece" in driving manufacturing and industrialization across Africa over the next decade. China-Africa Relations as Seen From the United States

As Chinese engagement in Africa steadily increased over the past twenty-five years, the U.S. has struggled to respond. Africa has consistently been a low priority in U.S. foreign policy, even with China's growing presence on the continent, and that's especially true today as events in the Middle East, Russia, and the South China Sea dominate the agenda. For the past two weeks, Eric, Cobus & Géraud crisscrossed the U.S. capital to meet with a wide range of stakeholders to get firsthand perspectives on how the China-Africa relationship in 2024 is seen from Washington. These discussions took place at a critical time when the political momentum shifted in Donald Trump's favor and one month before Chinese President Xi Jinping will host an African leaders summit in Beijing. Caution prevailed across most developing markets on Wednesday, ahead of China policy announcements and interest-rate decisions by a few central banks, while attention was also on the opening of South Africa's parliament following recent elections. MSCI's index tracking emerging markets equities slipped 0.4%, its third-straight day in losses, while a currencies gauge was flat against the dollar. China stocks settled higher by 0.5%, with markets anticipating any policy announcements to support the second largest economy's sluggish recovery, following the conclusion of a four-day Communist Party meet.
