A ceasefire has brought a reprieve to the war between Israel and Iran, halting the single most dangerous regional conflict in recent years. For Beijing, the world's largest oil importer, the lesson from the brief, 12-day conflict, could not be clearer: China cannot continue to rely on a region so prone to disruption for the resources needed to power its economic development. China has been successful at maintaining a balancing act between competing geopolitical forces, importing vast amounts of discounted crude from Iran while securing long-term liquefied natural gas (LNG) deals with Gulf suppliers.
